Social Media: Risky Online Behavior

With the advent of social networking sites and detailed chat profiles, predators don't need to work very hard to piece together information about a person online. Predators can judge by the appearance of a profile or by the behavior that person is exhibiting whether he or she might be prime a target for an online relationship.

Teens who don't use privacy settings on social networking and gaming sites often place their information including their deepest desires, likes and dislikes, real-time moods, pictures, addresses, and phone numbers for anyone to see. Teens who post personal information, blog or journal about sensitive issues may also be easy targets for predators who seek to isolate children from their parents and friends and exploit emotional vulnerabilities. Below is a list of social networking actions that may have terrible outcomes.

Sharing Everything with Everyone

- ◇ Checking in from every place you go to, including regularly checking in from the gym, favorite restaurant etc. By doing so you create a profile of yourself that is easily traceable by stalkers.
- ◇ Sharing photos taken with your phone, which are tagged with the exact location detail of where the photo was taken.
- ◇ Leaving your full birth date, phone number and home address on your public profile for everyone to see, including ill-intended strangers.
- ◇ Discussing personal problems with friends (and worse, with strangers) through public comments.

Most parents think they have taught their children, teens or young adults about social media dangers and the strangers that lurk behind the profile pictures, but for some, the message is still not clear. With the above information easily accessible how easy are you placing yourself in danger? How easy is it to create a fake profile and prey off the young adults wrapped up in the social media world? Coby Persin of Clifton, N.J conducted what he called a “child predator social experiment.” with their parents’ permission, he said he made a fake profile on Facebook posing as a 15-year-old boy, and sent friend requests to three girls ages 14, 13 and 12. The Following video holds an uneasy outcome.
